STORY

Jim Parkinson's typeface "Chuck" is a display style inspired by the super-fat letterforms on a 1937 bronze plaque honoring the builders of the Golden Gate Bridge in San Francisco. Located on the bridge's South tower, the plaque is visible to pedestrians crossing via the bridge's West walkway.

Fascinated by those letterforms, Parkinson noted the plaque contains enough characters to form a complete alphabet. He found the central design challenge was balancing the weight of the letters for even color while preserving the originals' eccentricity. He drew the new glyphs needed directly in Fontographer and released the first version of Chuck in 2004.

This latest update to version 2.3 greatly extends the glyph repertoire for increased language support, adds worldwide currency symbols, a set of arrows, fractions, and new features, such as: lowercase variants, and easy-to-assemble borders.

Parkinson stated the name "Chuck" is a stand-in representing all the riveters, ironworkers, laborers, and craftsmen who risked their lives to build the bridge — a group the plaque itself gives less space to than it gives to politicians and their associates. He wrote that the name perhaps should have been "Steve", after his uncle who was an ironworker on the San Francisco-Oakland Bay Bridge. •!•
